I'm not going to be able to read any other books after I get done with this series. Nothing else will have any appeal for me. maybe I'll just start over.

Shhhhh Ahhhhh says

Cliffhanger? Not the move, dude. Anyway, good addition, I guess. The combat is getting boring as shit, aside from Paul's maneuver on the Type 1 Walker, which was just brilliant. The sanctions came too little too late for my tastes, probably inspiring organizations similar to The Word in its wake, but we'll see about that. Stealing the gene sample seems inconsistent for the characters.

Meanwhile, I've only just noticed that in replicating capitalist philosophy throughout the series, the author has done something else, completely ignore starting advantages. When you get something for free, especially a whole lot of something, it seems increasingly shitty to force others to try and match what you've built while not having that advantage. Finding the pyramid and its databases AND ambrosia stores AND benefiting from gene editing is one hell of an advantage, especially for things like manufacture and warfare, even without data brokering, so seeing them then steamroll other species into submission using a 'play by our trade rules' flag seems pretty fucking suspect... just like real life capitalism!

Really hoping that the 2 main enemies kill each other off so we can get back to the part of this series that I enjoyed. Exploration.

Fun fascinating read

I continue to enjoy this series even at 14 books in. Nice mix of war (both ground and space) and empire building.

Slackers wow really

Good read. Some good plot twist. Some same old same old.
