Christina says

Rahzel and the group travel and stay in yet another new town, in search of Alzeid's father's killer, and while they are there, Rahzel runs into an old family friend, and Alzeid begins to face his social insecurities. But Alzeid won't have forever to dwell on one single matter, because when the developers of an extremely dangerous and mysterious new drug that has swept the youth of the town sets their sights on Rahzel as their new test subject, none may ever hear or see her again...

This was actually surprisingly even better and deeper while still unchanging from the original story. And somehow, that made it even better than most stories that take a sudden abrupt turn. Also, I love the new 'queer priest'! He is such an amazing character! However, his appearance reminds me a bit of Justin Law from Soul Eater... Their personalities are nearly polar opposites, though.

Actually, this 'queer' priest is one of my favorite characters from Dazzle, I think. LOL. Alzeid went far down the bar in this volume, and came a little ways back up again, but not yet back to where he was. I've also began to like Baroqueheat and Rahzel more. There were a few other interesting characters as well... and I wonder how Rahzel's memory loss will correlate with the rest of the story? Because it seems it is being ignored for now.

AND WHERE IS THAT RED-HEADED DUDE? HE DIDN'T MAKE A SINGLE APPEARANCE IN THIS ONE, AND YET HIS PICTURE WAS ON PAGE ONE. GRRR.

Anyway, the story seems to be maturing a bit more, and the art style is also improving, however, it seems that Dazzle is still only reaching its end of the early stages. ;3

P.S. Baroqueheat's little sister is a frikkin' prodigy, man... And she is kind hearted and beautiful... I WANT A SISTER LIKE THAT. O_O

Raven Black says

Seeing Rahzel's backstory made me so sad. Seeing the pain she went through and finding out how she met her foster father is an incredible. Reading this book reminding me so much of how much of her personality I put into Aiyana's.
